This information is based on our current understanding of the information recently posted by the U.S. Department of State. If the State Department issues any clarifications, this announcement will be updated.

On April 26, 2021, the Department of State announced [1] that F-1 and J-1 students travelling from China, Iran, Brazil, or South Africa can now travel directly to the United States provided that their academic programs begin August 1, 2021 or later, even though Presidential Proclamations 9984 [2] (China), 9992 [3] (Iran), and 10143 [4] (Brazil and South Africa) restricting travel remain in effect. On April 30, 2021, the Department of State announced [5] that a similar exception would apply to students travelling from India, even though a Presidential Proclamation [6] restricting entry to the U.S. will be in effect as of May 4, 2021.

Students travelling from these countries who need to apply for an F-1 visa can follow the normal visa application process. Students from these areas who are applying for a J-1 visa or planning to travel using their current J-1 visa should contact the nearest embassy or consulate to initiate a national interest exception (NIE) request.

As has been the case since July 22, 2020, F-1 and J-1 students from the Schengen Area, the United Kingdom, and Ireland can travel to the U.S. even though Presidential Proclamation 10143 restricting entry remains in effect. Students from the Schengen Area, the UK, and Ireland who need to apply for an F-1 visa can follow the normal visa application process. Students from those areas who are applying for a J-1 visa should contact the nearest embassy or consulate to initiate a national interest exception (NIE) request.
